In the heart of the congested city of Tokyo lies the moated palace grounds of Japan's emperor as photographed for the first time by Saipan-based Superforts. Just below the palace which fills the left center of the photograph is a large railroad station. The Sumida river runs across the picture past what appears to be a large stadium. In upper right portion can be seen a wartime firebreak, a vacant strip cleared through congested areas, Tokyo's hope against a city-sweeping conflagration.
